

Every morning Sarah began her summer days by going to the pond before breakfast. At the pond many different geese and swans always greeted her. She loved both types of birds and played with them throughout the summer. Then one crisp autumn morning Sarah found that her birds were gone. Sarah's mother explained that the birds flew to a warmer place to live during the winter. Sarah loved her birds so much she studied ornithology, or the study of birds, at school. As an adult, Federal Wildlife Agent Sarah goes to the marshes most days, keeping an eye on her birds as she does her job.
